/This article essentially consists of an attempt to classify the Tarascans on the basis of descriptive, anthropometric, and impressionistic interpretations of facial characteristics. The factual information presented consists primarily of statistics conventional to studies in physical anthropology, although there are brief notes on dances and masks. Some theoretical basis for the author's interpretation is given, but the typologies used are unusual for anthropological literature. Seven photographs, mostly of individuals, are included. Because this article is of a highly specialized nature and is less fact than interpretation, it has not been processed for the Tarasco file.--Analyst/

[This work is the result of the collaboration of several authors under the auspices of the Institute of Social Investigations of the National University of Mexico. The study gives broad coverage, both historical and topical, of the Tarascan culture. It has not been processed for the file inasmuch as the material available in English was considered adequate and for the most part was written by later authors who had this work at their disposal for reference. Nevertheless, it might prove valuable to anyone wanting to study the Tarascans thoroughly. The principal divisions of the study include sections on the pre-colonial, colonial and modern epochs, with an introduction and extensive synthesis by the editor.--Analyst]

[This short article deals mostly with the pre-hispanic distribution of the Tarascans. Archaeology is used to delimit the extent of the ancient Tarascan empire. Most of the information is duplicated in other sources, particularly 3: Beals et al, already processed for the Tarasco file. --Analyst]
